In 1975, federal law was amended to permit industry to sue government agencies if they proceed without basis or license. The Department of Commerce, which administers the environmental assessment program, is responsible for determining that the project is "reasonably likely" to cause a "significant adverse environmental impact." If an agency determines that a project will have a "significant adverse environmental impact," it must make a report to Congress, and let Congress decide whether to block the project. Where a project is subject to "reasonably likely" and "significant" environmental assessment, large industries and large projects have significant advantages. They may force a project to be cut into small parts, or acquire expensive permits, or threaten to work outside of the agency's jurisdiction, and thereby force a longer and potentially more expensive environmental assessment. In addition, business interests and political pressure may be brought to bear on agencies, and the assessment may be skewed in the direction of finding that the project is unlikely to have a significant adverse impact.A scavenger receptor homologue from Mytilus galloprovincialis: Role in cellular immune response and induction of interleukin-6 and haemolytic complement proteins by lipopolysaccharide. The study aimed to investigate the role of an Mg-Scavenger receptor (Mg-SR) and its involvement in the immune response against Vibrio anguillarum in the mussel Mytilus galloprovincialis. The results demonstrated, by RT-PCR, that Mg-SR was expressed in gills and hepatopancreas. Further, Mg-SR was expressed in cells of haemocyte lineage (also named haemocytes) in the haemolymph, as also 3da54e8ca3
