A semiconductor device produced in accordance with the scaling law can include a plurality of chips in a single package to obtain a higher processing speed and higher functionality. As high-power semiconductor devices become more highly integrated, power modules have been required which are capable of enabling the high-power semiconductor devices to output higher power. For example, a power module for rectifying and smoothing an alternating-current (AC) power supply voltage and supplying the voltage to a load includes a switching element that drives a silicon-trench diode or a free-running diode. The power module is capable of switching the power between a disconnect mode and a conducting mode in accordance with a state of the load. For example, as a level shift type transistor module, Patent Document 1 discloses a power module for supporting a level shift function between a first level signal voltage and a second level signal voltage. The power module has two transistors, two diodes, a first wire and a second wire. The transistors correspond to first and second power switching elements, respectively. The first wire is connected between a first power source line and a gate of the first transistor. The second wire is connected between the gate of the first transistor and a drain of the first transistor. The diodes are connected in series between the first power source line and the first transistor. The first wire is connected to a second power source line through the diodes. The first wire and the second wire are connected to a gate and a drain of the second transistor, respectively
