Screening for TP53 germline mutations in patients with familial and sporadic breast cancer. Mutations of the tumor suppressor gene TP53 have been identified in the germline of several families with multiple cases of hereditary breast and/or ovarian cancer (HBOC). Previous research identified a high prevalence of TP53 germline mutations in HBOC families with two or more cases of breast cancer. However, the TP53 mutation rate in familial breast cancer and sporadic breast cancer (SBC) is not well known. In this study, both TP53 exons 5-8 and 10 were analyzed in SBC and primary breast tumors in our institution. A total of 231 SBC and 277 breast cancer patients (all from non-Jewish southern Ontario) were included in this study. All patients (except those with a diagnosis of male breast cancer) had at least two first-degree relatives with breast or ovarian cancer, as determined by family history information or breast cancer registries. In total, we identified four TP53 mutations in four (0.17%) SBC cases and none (0%) in the breast tumors. The presence of a TP53 germline mutation was similar in SBC and SBC patients without family histories of breast or ovarian cancer ($P = 0.10$, Fisher exact test). All mutations of the TP53 gene in SBC and SBC with family history of breast cancer were missense mutations. These results demonstrate that the frequency of TP53 germline mutations is low in both SBC and SBC without a family history of breast or ovarian cancer. Q: Does the brain need to be cooled when it's in the operating temperature? I read an article that said brain has to be cooled. I also heard there is a research for using liquid nitrogen to cool brain. Does the brain need to be cooled when it's in operating temperature, just like other organs of the body? A: The article where you read that is likely referring to hyperthermia, an issue in medical treatment. Many tumors in the brain's can be controlled or eliminated (in the case of malignant glioblastoma) by freezing the tumor. Hypothermia, however, is used to reduce brain activity, which can be required, for example, to reduce seizures that are refractory to treatment.
