It's worth remembering that Milano fall season is a sleepy time. But some real things are happening. The Milan stage of the AC Milan fashion show has become famous for the sheer quantity of beauty queens that's graced its catwalk in recent seasons, not least of all for coming in the skins of Asian beauties. It's a statement about the way international markets have changed, where the race for global beauty has shifted to East Asia and South East Asia and away from Europe. But that's not all that's going on. The changing face of beauty The process of creating an ideal female figure is no longer reserved for the artists, fashionistas and cosmetologists of the West. At a time when marketing is all about authenticity, what's translated as beauty is no longer the same as in decades gone by. All that's changed is where the target markets are located. The future is still in Asia. As Europe and the US continue to shrug off the legacy of twentieth century industrialisation, Asia and now the Americas are gearing up to be the powerhouses of the world economy. As in fact they have been since the end of the Second World War. In the next ten years, Asia is forecast to be the largest economy in the world. The growth rate for Asia is three times as high as that of the EU and four times as high as that of the US. Milano fall shows - also known as fashion weeks - are the world's best advertisement of what the fashionistas of the world have been up to. They are the showcase shows for the most influential fashion houses. Each season is packed with celebrity unveilings. One of them is always placed firmly at the intersection of fashion and beauty. Namely, it is where the Eastern and Western markets collide. Being beautiful in Asia has been made very easy indeed. Even a decade ago, for
